

There are Deepin-specific settings in dconf. The dconf editor showed settings for the wallpaper; however, the only option for 'Wallpaper Slideshow' was the time interval for changing the image. It is possible that the Deepin distribution handles this instance differently or that the directory from which the images are selected may become configurable in a later version.

The settings and corner options

Clicking on Settings opens a panel on the right. The settings can be conveniently modified from the panel. The functionality and simplicity of accessing the settings appealed to me. As earlier, there is no Save/Cancel needed. Clicking anywhere on the desktop makes the side panel for the settings disappear.

Configuring the corners offers a limited set of options. It is similar to the KDE Plasma options for the corners and sides. I like the option of viewing all windows to quickly switch between them. The option for a 'Fast Screen Off' can be useful for privacy or when working with confidential information. On my slow machine, the corner settings were not consistently as responsive as I had expected. That may be the reason they are not enabled, by default.

The negatives

As noted above, the corners did not respond consistently on the slow system. Occasionally, the scrolling of the mouse would not work in the browser.

It is likely that in an effort to have high responsiveness, some erratic and inconsistent behaviour shows up.

I prefer to disable Display on any icon on the desktop. I could not find a way to prevent it from showing the contents of the Desktop folder.

Overall, while most of my time is spent in Firefox or LibreOffice, the little touches of Deepin do add a bit of fun and charm to the desktop experience. For example, pressing the 'Power' button brings up the expected options to log out, switch user, etc. A nice touch is the blurring of the wallpaper image so that there is greater focus on the command options.

Deepin is definitely worth exploring! END
