

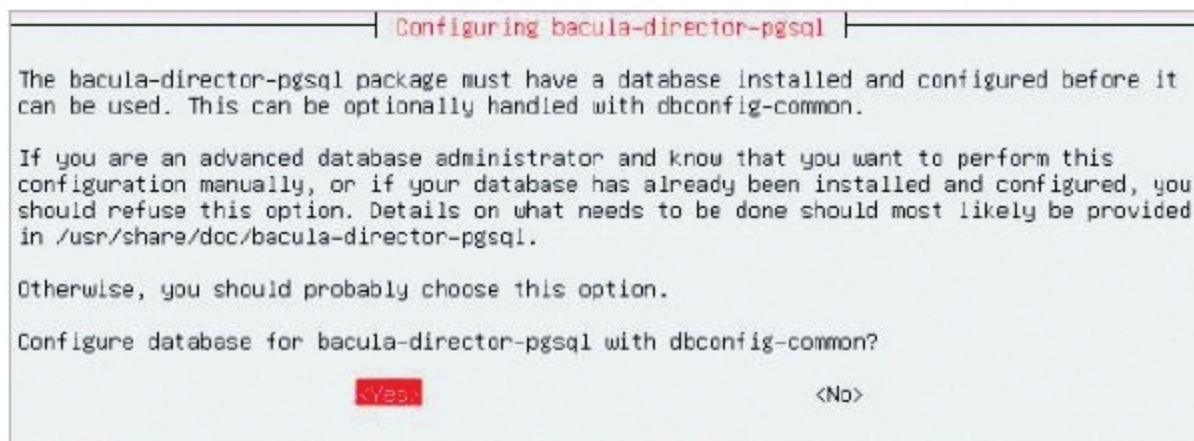

Figure 4: Configuring Bacula with Postgres

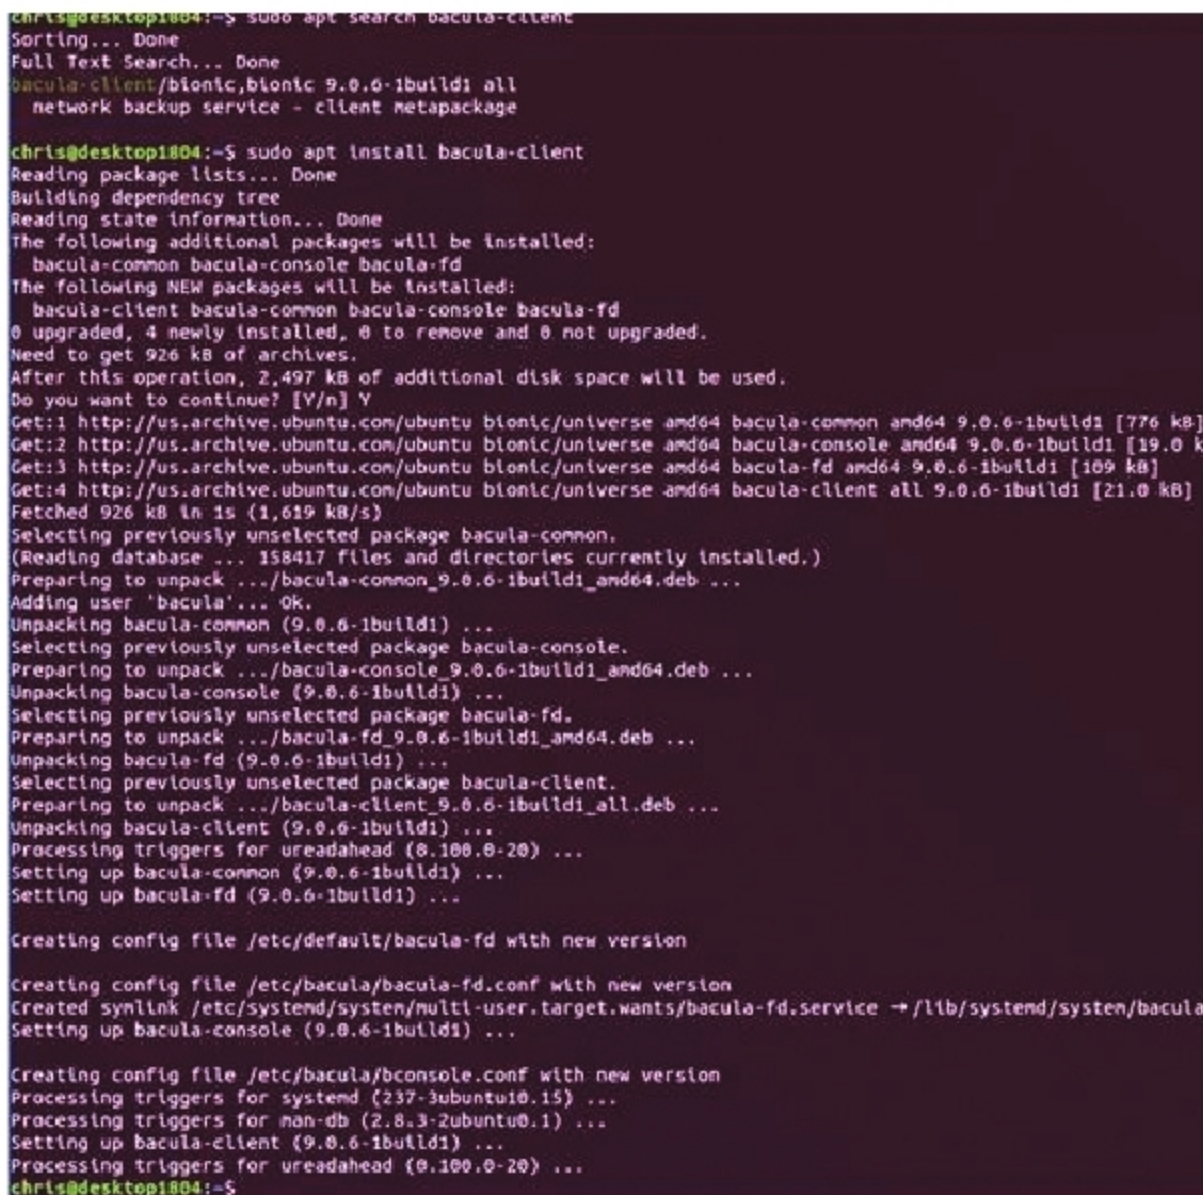

Figure 5: Bacula on the client

bacula-fd.conf, common_passwords, bconsole and a scripts directory.

That is it for the Bacula installation and the initial setup.

Why Bacula is more popular than other solutions

There are many advantages Bacula offers that other backup solutions do not. These include the following:

1. There is a client for each machine, so you can back up and recover client data of any type, ensuring that all attributes of files are properly saved and restored.

2. Bacula uses well-defined (IANA registered) TCP/IP ports — with no rpcs or shared memory.
3. Any SQL database engine can be used, making Bacula very flexible. Currently, there are drivers for MySQL, PostgreSQL and SQLite.

4. It handles multi-volume backups and has a built-in job scheduler.
5. Bacula is four times as fast as any other commercial application, probably because those applications store their catalogue information in a large number of individual files rather than in an SQL database as Bacula does.

When and where Bacula should be used

For programs such as tar, dump, or bru that are used to back up your computer data, you would like a network solution, more flexibility, or catalogue services. In such cases, Bacula will most likely provide the additional features you want.

If you would like a backup program that can write to multiple volumes (i.e., which is not limited by your tape drive's capacity), Bacula can most likely fill your needs. In addition, quite a number of Bacula users report that it is simpler to set up and use than other equivalent programs.

If you are currently using a sophisticated commercial package such as Legato Networker, ARCserveIT, Arkeia, or PerfectBackup+, you may be interested in Bacula, which provides many of the same features and is free software available under the Affero GPL Version 3 software licence.

This article gives you a brief introduction to Bacula configuration. If you get stuck, the Bacula website has an excellent manual that you can read. END

References

- [1] bacula.org
- [2] baculasystems.com

By Neetesh Mehrotra

The author works at NIIT Technologies as a senior test engineer. His areas of interest are Java development and automation testing.