Plasma is the most noticed and talked about component of the KDE project. All the changes made to Plasma can be noticed immediately, though developers still need to make some more fixes.

This release adds a month's worth of new translations and fixes from KDE's contributors."

Android Ice Cream Sandwich will not get any major Chrome release

Android has moved way ahead from the era of Ice Cream Sandwich, and so has Google. The Android OS and Chrome browser maker has announced that it will not provide any major Chrome browser release for Android 4.0 (Ice Cream Sandwich). After the last major version of Chrome browser for Android KitKat, which is Chrome version 42, Google will freeze the development of the browser for the Android version.

Google stated that the number of Chrome users on Android 4.0 have been decreasing constantly. In addition, the backward compatibility has been restricting the company from coming up with new features that will work well on older devices. Aurimas Lutikas, software engineer, Google, wrote in a blog post, "In the last year, we've seen the number of Chrome users running ICS drop by 30 per cent. Developing new features on older phones has become increasingly challenging, and supporting ICS takes time away from building new experiences on the devices owned by the vast majority of our users."

However, the company has promised regular security patches till Google releases version 43 of the Chrome browser. But the Ice Cream Sandwich users will not get anything after that from the Chrome development team.
