

text into parts such as paragraphs, sentences or words), stem (remove and replace word suffixes to arrive at the common root form of the word), tag and chunk (recognise different words as nouns, verbs, etc), and a lot more.

You can make your own simple sentiment analysis software. The following trivial code example will give readers a brief idea of how to make it work.

import nltk
import sys
sentence = sys.stdin.read() # to get input from stdin tokens = nltk.word_tokenize(sentence) scorer = 0 #keep a score of how positive or negative the statement is
for word in tokens:
/* in the following if statements, we will be giving our own condition to assign a score depending on how negative or positive a word is, from a selected set of words. You can add more words or choose a different words. */ if word=="good":
        scorer = scorer + 1
    if word=="great":
        scorer = scorer + 2
    if word=="bad":
        scorer = scorer - 1
    if word=="terrible":

```
scorer = scorer - 2
```

```
if scorer == 0:
    print "neutral"
if scorer > 0:
    print "positive"
if scorer < 0:
    print "negative"

The above example is very basic but to actually make software that can process the complexities of various real world texts, more rigorous algorithms and larger sets of data are used.
