Contributing to Tips and Tricks

I have been reading LFY for the last one year. It's a really amazing magazine that makes FOSS adoption more approachable. Tips and Tricks and Know how are really useful for sys admins and IT infra people. I am one among the many who started using Ubuntu and Mandriva Linux by reading LFY and now my entire team uses Linux desktop OSs like Pardus, Ubuntu, PCLinux, and so on.

I would also like to submit some contributions to the Tips and Tricks section; hence I am attaching an article on how to convert the .pcf ciscovpn profile to .conf files and use them to connect the Cisco VPN from Ubuntu. Hope this will be useful.

ED: Thanks a lot for the feedback and your contribution to Tips and Tricks. Our tech team will review it and revert to you within a few days. We will check whether your submission ought to appear on its own as an article or be published under the Tips and Tricks section.

We do invite further contributions from you for both Tips and Tricks and individual articles. You definitely seem to have the background and experience to contribute on interesting topics. Thanks once again.

PDFs of 'A Voyage to the Kernel'

I started subscribing to LINUX For You a year back.

I find it informative as well as interesting. I especially like the feature, 'A Voyage to the Kernel'. I'd love to read the previous articles in this series. Kindly provide me with a download link to those PDFs or, if possible, please mail it to me.

ED: Thanks for the feedback. We are working on building a registration system, after which our readers will get access to the series, for FREE! But for that, you will need to wait for a week or two.

Wish-lists...

I'm a regular reader of LFY and I think it's awesome. Hats off to the LFY team! I'd like to learn how to make a Firefox addition. Could you please post an article on this? Also, I've heard that earlier, LFY had featured some articles related to learning Python. How can I access these archives?

ED: Thanks for the feedback. We will certainly try and include an article or a tip on the 'Firefox addition' angle. W.r.t. the Python series, do check out linuxforu.com—many of the articles should be there. In another month, we will be launching a section on linuxforu.com, where registered users will be able to access older content.

I've regularly subscribed to LFY for the last four years. I congratulate you on producing a high quality FOSS magazine, which you have improved in many ways. I really appreciate you guys for the effort.

For your information, I haven't seen any article on lightweight window managers like the awesome wm. I hope you will publish some article on this subject soon and also provide wm on a DVD/CD. Here's wishing the team the best of luck!

ED: Thanks for the feedback. Will surely try and see if our team can come up with an article on this topic. Do keep sending in your suggestions and feedback.

I have been subscribing to LFY for a couple of years. No doubt it is an excellent magazine in spreading the word about Linux and FOSS. As we know, FOSS is based on several basic ideologies, where users can use, study, change, and improve the design of software because of the availability of its source code. In this movement LFY may help its readers by:

1. Putting the source code of Linux in its companion DVD (e.g., Fedora 13 accompanied by its source code on a DVD).
2. Including articles on some cross-reference software like lxr (I don't know too much about such software), its installation and its uses.

ED: Thanks for your feedback and suggestions. We will surely review them and try to implement them ASAP. Please do keep writing in—we welcome story ideas from our readers.

No reminders about an expired subscription!

This is to point out a grave marketing flaw with respect to renewal of LFY subscriptions. In my case, my subscription for LFY and EFY ended two months ago.
