

“Our goal is to advance Linux as a technology and collaborate with the community for mutual benefits”

SUSE is banking big on the Indian market. It is getting aggressive about increasing its market share in the enterprise space. The new team of leaders, courtesy its acquisition by the Attachmate Group, has some different plans. The team members want to grow the business but still want to keep SUSE's roots in the open source community intact. Diksha P Gupta from Open Source For You spoke to Nils Brauckmann, president and general manager of SUSE and Venkatesh Swaminathan, country manager, The Attachmate Group (India). Excerpts:

Q Nils, what brings you to India?

Nils: First of all, India is a very interesting market for us. We have been investing in this market since many years with our team, business partners and business partner networks. From time to time, we try to stay in touch with the market to personally get to know customers better, to talk to prospects and to promote SUSE as a company, as well as its solutions and services.

Q SUSE has now been acquired by the Attachmate group. What do you find interesting in India from Attachmate's perspective?

Nils: I worked for the Attachmate group earlier and now I am heading SUSE. In my previous role, I was vice president for Eastern Europe and Africa. So my engagements with Asia were very limited. But now my focus is the Asian market place, where India is obviously a major player. What is special about this market is that we have a couple of very fast growing economies that are undergoing a change at the enterprise level and the customer landscape very fast. These markets are, generally speaking, interesting for every vendor. Two of the BRIC countries are a part of the Asian market and India is one of the most dominant of those. So what I have observed is that there is more dynamism, development, engagement and receptiveness to new technologies. These are very lively and vibrant markets, both with regard to growth and the adoption of technology.
