

“We are looking to hire people with core Android experience”

Before Xiaomi was to enter the Indian market, many assumed that this was just another Chinese smartphone coming their way. But perceptions changed after the brand entered the sub-continent. Flipkart got bombarded with orders and Xiaomi eventually could not meet the Indian demand. There are quite a few reasons for this explosive demand, but one of the most important factors is the unique user experience that the device offers. It runs on Android, but on a different version—one that originates from the brain of Hugo Barra, vice president, Xiaomi. When he was at Google, he was pretty much instrumental in making the Android OS what it is. Currently, he is focused on offering a different taste of it at a unique price point. He has launched MIUI, an Android-based OS that he wants to be ported to devices other than Xiaomi. For this, he needs a lot of help from the developers' community. Diksha P Gupta from Open Source For You caught up with him to discuss his plans for India and how he wants to contribute to and leverage the developers' ecosystem in the country. Read on...

Hugo Barra, vice president, Xiaomi