

YOU SAID IT

Appreciation for the June edition... and a few concerns

I am an IT administrator and read articles that are related to my domain. While going through the June 2011 edition of LFY, I came across the article 'Lisp: The Tears Of Joy'. I usually ignore articles on programming languages but the very first line of this article caught my attention and I could not put the magazine down until I finished reading it.

The writing style of the article was so humorous that there was a smile on my face for hours after I finished reading it. Inspired by the article, I am going to pick up a book on Lisp today!

I work in flipkart.com in Koramangla, Bengaluru. I shared this article with my colleagues and every one enjoyed reading it. As we get only one copy of this magazine in our office, we went on a hunt to buy more copies. There are many book stores near my office. I checked the availability of the magazine at book stores like Landmark, Tata Chroma, Star Bazaar and Hyper Books, but couldn't find any. I suggest that when you feature authors like Vivek Shangari, please ensure the availability of extra copies in the market!

ED: We are glad that you liked reading the article on Lisp. We have conveyed your words of appreciation to Vivek Shangari.

Thanks for the alert about the limited availability of LFY in Bengaluru. We have informed our circulation team and we expect them to correct this within a couple of months. Asking the newsstand vendors to stock more LFY copies does help—when these vendors see the demand, they start stocking.

On another note, in case you require a single edition of the magazine, you can buy it online too by visiting pay.efyindia.com. Alternatively, you can place an order by sending an e-mail to: info@kitsnspares.com. You could also consider subscribing to the magazine if you are a regular reader. Hope this helps!

About Natty, Lisp, open source and robotics

I recently installed Ubuntu 11.04 on my PC. I previously had version 10.10 and my system was working fine. But after installing version 11.04, I started encountering problems. Evolution Mail used to shut down automatically and many a time the system stopped responding. I checked for its solution online and found many horrific stories about 11.04. According to me, it is a very unstable product and needs a lot of work. Troubled, I have gone back to Ubuntu 10.10. Please update your readers about this.

I would also like to share my observations regarding the content of the magazine. In the June edition, the article 'Open Hardware Sparks Innovation in Robotics' was a very nicely written piece. I also enjoyed reading the article on Lisp. Please convey my best wishes to Vivek Shangari for his future articles. My view is, he should consider writing a book. It will be a big hit!

ED: Thanks for making the time to share your observations regarding Ubuntu 11.04. We are sure our readers will find the information useful.

Also, many thanks for your compliments on the articles carried in LFY's June edition. We have conveyed your feedback to the authors of both the articles. E-mails like yours motivate each member of the LFY team to work harder and strive to make the magazine even better. Would love to hear more from you in the future too!

... And it was Lisp all the way!

My son has recently opted for computer science this academic year. He has an inquisitive mind and is highly interested in technology. Of late, I have often tried to get him to read LFY but he didn't take to it.

However, things changed when I showed him this month's article on Lisp. He read it from start to finish, then immediately leapt to his computer to download Lisp-related information and try his hands at the program mentioned in the article. He was very excited when the instructions given in the article worked! In fact, he even called his friends over and shared the information about Lisp with them. I must say, you have outdone yourself this time! Do convey my compliments to the author too. Please keep publishing such articles in the future too.
