

On writing for your website

I think your site <http://www.linuxforu.com> offers great security and tech information for your readers, and I'd love to help contribute with some unique content.

I could write about why Google passwords are not cutting it anymore, why they are easily hacked and the best practices for avoiding your password being compromised. I could also write about the latest trends in biometric technology in Linux (security technology). The last idea I have deals with tips and tricks for using two factor authentication technology with Linux.

Do let me know if you're interested in any of these topics.

Articles on Linux job prospects

Karthik M'lore: Hey, sorry, I couldn't locate the 'suggestion' section on your website, but I think it would be a good time to dedicate an issue to Linux job prospects (as Linux pros are in high demand right now). It would be great to know about the different types of jobs, what the qualifications required for these jobs are, the essential skills required to get those qualifications/certifications and where/how to find jobs in this field... if not a whole magazine issue, some online articles would surely help many people like me.

Open Source For You: Hey Karthik, thanks a lot for the suggestion! We do carry career related stories in our magazine and try to cover some aspects of the topics you suggested. We also carry a series of interviews called 'Recruitment Trends' where we interview industry heads and ask them about who's recruiting open source engineers, how many, which technologies are in demand, etc. But we will try our best to take your suggestion and include more articles on Linux careers in our forthcoming publications. If you wish to read more career-related articles, you can log on to our website <http://www.linuxforu.com/>.
