

do so in the future, Jay Sullivan, vice president, Mozilla was quoted as saying in the report.

Sullivan argued that Apple's closed environment has resulted in users suffering from its stringent policies. The bigger concern for Mozilla is that Apple's policies do not allow Firefox's sophisticated rendering and Javascript engines to be carried over to iOS. "Mozilla doesn't think that it can build the browser that it wants to, for Apple's platform," Sullivan added.

It should be noted that Apple does not allow its iPhone and iPad users to choose any other browser but Safari as the default browser, which makes the whole point of offering Firefox quite redundant.

A bracelet that connects you to your Android smartphone!

The Android world is surely scaling new heights in technology. For all the Android smartphone lovers who want to avoid carrying their huge devices in their hands, here is a bracelet that keeps you connected to your smartphones without the bother of carrying it.

The Embrace Plus bracelet keeps users connected to their smartphones and notifies them about different calls and notifications by flashing different colours. You can choose a different colour on the bracelet for your boss, girlfriend, friends' group and more. The bracelet, available in three designs, is 8mm thick at the top, 5.4 mm thick at the bottom and 12mm wide.

The Embrace Plus bracelet looks stylish on both men and women. It is made up of soft material and is feather-light, which makes it comfortable to wear. Users can customise a notification with one colour or two different colours with the Embrace Plus app. They can also set the number of blinks, the duration of each blink, the speed interval, the lighting brightness, and a short subtle vibration with the first blink.

The smallest Android 'smartwatch' is out, courtesy India

Scaling new heights, an India-based tech firm called Android Systems Pvt Ltd has launched the smallest Android-based watch that comes with smartphone-like features too. Set up by a team of four, the Androidly smartwatch has been backed by many interested parties and the company has priced the innovative miniature device, starting at $249.

Androidly is a single device that can do everything from sharing content and making calls, to receiving messages. This smartwatch sports a 5-cm (2-inch) display and runs Android 2.2 (Froyo). The watch is powered by a 416 MHz processor and 256 MB RAM. It also comes with a camera, Wi-Fi and Bluetooth support, a SIM card slot, Google Play Store and other wireless modes. The watch has an internal storage capacity of 8 GB also.

Going by the features offered, Androidly is undoubtedly one of the most complete smartwatches in the market right now.
