

“India now ranks among the Top 10 countries in terms of the number of open source projects”

Ajeet Singh Raina

Ajeet Singh Raina's journey as a community leader began with an introduction to Linux For You magazine (now Open Source For You). And he hasn't looked back since then.

A Docker captain, he was awarded at Dockercon earlier this year for his contribution to the Docker community. Here is his take on what a community leader should do and the future of open source in the country.

Ajeet Singh Raina is an independent freelancer at Collabnix. His love for open source began very early when he was first introduced to it via Linux For You magazine (now Open Source for You). Raina recalls his college days when he tried out Xandros for the first time. This excited him enough to explore the open source world further. He then tried out almost every single distribution/software that was bundled with the magazine, for a couple of years.

Raina says, “If you ask me the definition of open source software (OSS) in 2020, it is no longer limited to just inspecting, modifying and enhancing the source code. Today, the open source space is all about coming together, collaborating and building the community. If you think that building community is just about grouping like-minded people in one place, then you are half-right. The other half involves a lot more. Cultivating a community is an art. It requires a massive dose of LEAD (listening, engaging, analysing and development). That's the primary
