

Takeaways: From its very inception, Zeiss has kept pace with the market, understood its consumers and been an innovator. It has had many firsts over the years. It has also partnered with other camera companies like Hasselblad and Sony, which has ensured it delivers quality lenses consistently. Building a brand early on is critical to the longevity of the business, and Zeiss has survived when its competitors failed. It positioned itself perfectly to be the ingredient brand during the biggest consumer boom of camera phones.

The bottom line

Here are a few key principles that we can take away from these case studies:

- Speaking to a niche audience that is knowledgeable and impatient has advantages for a company; it is pushed to the limit when it comes to innovation. The desire to surprise its consumers is a great motivator for a company.
- Partnering is again a critical step to stay at the cutting-edge. Zeiss has done it for the longest time and so has NVIDIA. And their partnerships include licensing, sharing of knowledge, technology and knowhow.
- Building a brand with the end user is critical, as that creates a 'pull' for the ingredient brand (we saw how players like Xbox, PlayStation and Nokia rely on the end user to build their expertise and create loyalty with their customers). It allows companies to charge a premium with the end user, partly because they are using the ingredient brand. It's a great position to be in, for any company.

Here's hoping this article inspires some Indian ingredient brands to make an impact on the Indian and global markets. The principles are quite the same wherever you may be. As long as you invest in development and choose your segment wisely, there are opportunities out there waiting to be either created or grabbed. All the best! END 🐧
